It., destrina. Sp., dextrina [Sp. Ph., Mex. Ph.]. Syn.: British gum, leicome. A carbohydrate, $C_6H_{10}O_5$, obtained from starch by the action of dilute acids, of diastase, and of animal ferments, and also by a dry heat of 200° C., according to some authors. It is an uncrystallizable, insipid, odorless, yellowish-white, brittle substance, soluble in water and in dilute alcohol, and precipitated as a hydrate from its solutions by strong alcohol. It is not colored blue by iodine, nor does it ferment by contact with yeast, nor yield any sugar to Frommer's test, if pure. By diastase it is converted into maltose, and by boiling with dilute acids it is transformed into dextrose (or ordinary glucose) or, according to some, into maltose. There are several varieties of d. (erythrod', achrood', etc.), into which starch is converted by the action of animal ferments. A form of d. has been obtained by Musculus and von Meyer from glucose which has a specific dextrorotary power of 131° to 134°. D. much resembles gum arabic, for which it is often used. Fr., diabétomètre. An instrument for estimating the quantity of sugar in a given specimen of diabetic urine. A, chamber filled with weak solution of bichromate of potassium; B, half-shade polarizer; C, tube holding saccharine fluid under examination; D, Nicol prism; O, independent regulator; G, graduated disc.

mechanism for sensitiveness is arranged to produce a circular field of vision divided into halves, which in certain positions of an analyzing Nicol prism are unequally illuminated, but exhibit in one position a uniformly faint shade; this latter position is taken as the point of reference. To prevent confusion, a monochromatic light is employed, obtained by burning a piece of salt in a Bunsen jet. To use the d., the operator first adjusts the point of reference by allowing the polarized light to pass through the tube (C), previously filled with distilled water, rotating the Nicol prism by means of the independent regulator (O) until the field of vision is evenly lighted (Fig. 2); he then substitutes for the tube of water one containing the saccharine urine. This darkens the field of vision, as in Fig. 4. The inequality is then rectified by manipulating the graduated disc (G) previously adjusted at zero. Any inaccuracy will cause the other half of the field to become darkened (Fig. 2). After rectification, the new position of the disc indicates the amount of sugar in the urine, each division of the scale representing 1 gramme to a litre. [F. R. Cruise, "Dub. Jour. of Med. Sci.," vol. lxxxi, p. 497 (α, 25).]

Ph., a preparation made by digesting for 24 hours, at a temperature of 120° F., 40 oz. of digitalis-leaves in coarse powder in a gallon of rectified spirit of 0·838, putting them into a percolator, and, when the tincture has ceased to drop, pouring a gallon of spirit on the contents of the percolator and allowing it to percolate through slowly, distilling off the greater part of the spirit from the tincture, and evaporating the remainder over a water-bath until the whole of the alcohol has been dissipated, mixing the residual extract with 5 oz. of distilled water, to which ½ oz. of acetic acid has been previously added, and digesting this solution with ¼ oz. of purified animal charcoal, filtering and diluting the filtrate with distilled water until it measures a pint, then adding ammonia-water nearly to neutralization, and afterward 160 gr. of tannic acid dissolved in 3 oz. of distilled water, washing the precipitate that will be formed with a little distilled water, rubbing it in a mortar with a small quantity of the spirit and ¼ oz. of lead oxide, placing the mixture in a flask, and adding to it 4 oz. of the spirit, raising the temperature to 160° F., and keeping it at this point for about an hour, then adding ½ oz. of purified animal charcoal, putting it on a filter and evaporating the spirit by the heat of a water-bath, and finally washing the residue repeatedly with pure ether. The process of the U. S. Ph., 1870, was nearly identical with that of the Br. Ph. The digitaline amorphe of the Fr. Cod. is made by exhausting by displacement 1,000 grammes of the leaves of Digitalis purpurea with a quantity of distilled water sufficient to make 3 litres of fluid of a minimum density of 1·050, mixing this liquid with 250 grammes of solution of lead subacetate, filtering the precipitate, mixing the product first with 40 grammes of crystallized sodium carbonate, and afterward with 20 grammes of ammoniacal sodium carbonate, filtering again and precipitating by the addition of an aqueous solution of 40 grammes of tannic acid, collecting the precipitate on a filter, and mixing it with 25 grammes of powdered lead oxide and 50 grammes of purified animal charcoal, and exhausting with 90-per-cent. alcohol, evaporating on a water-bath to dryness, exhausting the residue with distilled water, exhausting again with 90-per-cent. alcohol, evaporating the alcoholic solution, and exhausting the residue with chloroform. [B, 81, 95, 113 (a, 21).]—Crystallized d. Lat., digitalina cristallisata [Fr. Cod.]. Sp., dedalera. The fox-glove, fairy-fingers, dead-men's-bells; a biennial or perennial European species cultivated in the United States; official in the Lond. Ph. of 1650, but introduced into modern medicinal use chiefly by Withering (1776–'79). It stimulates the action of the heart, increasing the force of its systole and prolonging its diastole. In poisonous doses it arrests the heart's action in firm systole. It is said to act like ergot on unstriped muscular fibres, producing contraction of the uterus, of the blood-vessels, etc., thus acting as a hæmostatic. It also acts as a diuretic. Its most important use is as a tonic to the heart in diseases of that organ manifested by rapid and weak action and low arterial tension, and in weakness of the heart occurring in the course of various febrile diseases. It has been considered an antipyretic, and has been recommended in scarlet fever, erysipelas, acute rheumatism (especially with cardiac complications), pulmonary inflammations, congestive hemicrania, acute delirium (especially delirium tremens), functional exophthalmic goître, spermatorrhœa, renal dropsy, etc. It was formerly regarded as peculiarly cumulative in its action, but this view was probably erroneous. The wild plant is considered far superior to the cultivated variety in medicinal properties. [Billington (a, 25).]—Malignant d. D. characterized by such rapidity and intensity in the development of the local manifestations, or such overwhelming constitutional poisoning, that the typical clinical gradations of the disease are unrecognizable. Death occurs from the third to the seventh day. [Billington (a, 25).]—Nasal d. A severe form of d. which may exist alone or in connection with d. in the fauces and pharynx. If then the d. is rotated with the rapidity of fifty revolutions in a second, the black sector produces a gray circle upon the white ground, the intensity of which is in direct proportion to the size of the sector. A central clear spot, the funnel-like depression from which emerges the central retinal vessel. 2. A vascular zone containing many capillaries. 3. A narrow, light band, the connective-tissue ring. 4. Syn.: bronzed-skin d. A clearly defined, constitutional d. appearing as a chronic, local inflammation of the suprarenal capsules, but really consisting in a "peculiar anæmic condition always tending toward death, which is characterized by an intense development of pigment in the cells of the rete Malpighii and in the epithelium of the mucous membrane of the mouth" [Averbeck]. The original theory that the inflammatory processes involving the adrenals with their subsequent degeneration constituted the d. per se has been modified. When there is marked enlargement of the organs and the surrounding inflammation is considerable, the semilunar ganglia and the solar plexus, with the nerves given off by them, are not infrequently found involved. Upon this has been based the assumption that morbid changes in the sympathetic system constitute the initial lesion and fundamental anatomical change upon which the subsequent symptoms are developed. The symptoms develop very gradually, the earlier ones being frequently overlooked. In a well-marked case may be observed weariness, malaise, debility, anæmia, wasting, pearly sclerotics, flabby muscles, and disordered digestion with vomiting, probably sympathetic. Pain is experienced, of more or less severity, in the hypochondria, spine, and joints. The heart impulse becomes weaker and a low anæmic murmur may be heard. The gastro-intestinal disturbances increase and diarrhœa supervenes. An occasional febrile rise may occur, but a low temperature is the rule. The skin discoloration begins at those areas of the surface of the body usually exposed to light, the changes being very gradual, from a grayish-brown even to copper-color. The palms, soles, nails, and sclerotics do not change. Post-mortem manifestations in the suprarenal capsules show these organs to be large, hard, and nodular, although sometimes unchanged in size or even atrophied. Section shows cheesy degeneration, with perhaps calcification or softening. The cheesy deposits are surrounded by agglomerations of tubercular, granulative, and connective tissue. Sometimes the capsules are found to be infiltrated with carcinomatous deposits or to be the seat of fatty or waxy degeneration. Cases are cited in which the adrenals were found to have been destroyed. The changes in the blood are said to resemble those found in pernicious anæmia. A theory, hardly compatible with the total destruction of the capsules by the disease, has been advanced that the process is a chemical one, assigning a secretory function to the capsules whose morbid over-production of deleterious chemical compounds partially dissolves the blood, causes the anæmia, and precipitates the hæmoglobin, giving rise to the discoloration of the skin. The prognosis is unfavorable and the treatment only palliative. The d. was discovered in 1855 by Dr. Addison, of Guy's Hospital, from whom it received its name. DUBOISINE, n. Du6-bwa3s'en. Lat., duboisina, duboisinum, duboisia. Fr., d. Ger., Duboisin. It., Sp., duboisina [Mex. Ph.]. An alkaloid, $C_{30}H_{23}Az_6O$, discovered by A. W. Gerrard and A. Petit, in 1878, in the leaves of Duboisia myoporoides, subsequently found in Atropa belladonna, Datura stramonium, and Hyoscyamus niger; isomeric with atropine and hyoscyamine. It occurs as a yellow, viscous mass, reddened by sulphuric acid, and giving off an unpleasant odor, like that of butyric acid when warmed. It acts as a mydriatic more rapidly than atropine, but the effects pass off more quickly. Its toxic effects differ from those of atropine by the absence of delirium and respiratory disturbance. It is said to have been used in exophthalmic goitre with advantage, causing a marked diminution of the cardiac and vascular distress, without, however, lessening the tumor or permanently suspending the symptoms of the disease. Fr., echinocoque. Ger., Echinokokkus, Hülsenwurm, Blasenwurm, Blasenstachelwurm. It., echinococco. Sp., equinócoco. 1. A genus of the Cystica, or of the Tæniadæ. 2. The larval stage of the Tænia e. after it has penetrated into some tissue of its host. The embryo, after having reached its permanent situation, loses its hooks and becomes a somewhat spherical mass, which increases slowly in size, and contains a clear liquid rich in albuminoids. Its walls consist of two layers—the outer (ectocyst), cuticular in nature, the inner (endocyst, germinal membrane [Ger., Keimhaut]), granular and regarded as an expansion of the parenchyma of the scolex, and, according to some authorities, provided with an epithelium. The outer layer is tightly stretched, and, when cut, rolls up. External to the e. proper is an investment formed of the tissue in which it is imbedded. From the inner layer brood-capsules are developed which give rise to e. heads. The heads are developed from the outer layer of the brood-capsule, in the shape of hollow, bud-like processes, which, by invagination, reach its interior, remaining attached by a pedicle. Exceptionally the head is developed from the inner surface of the brood-capsule. Secondary cysts (daughter-cysts) may arise from the ectocyst or from the heads and brood-capsules, which undergo a species of metamorphosis and project into the cavity of the e. or externally. From these brood-capsules and head are developed a third set of cysts (granddaughter-cysts). The heads, when set free and ingested by the proper host (the dog, jackal, or wolf), develop into the Tænia e. Occasionally the e. consists simply of a cyst without any brood-capsules, and is then termed an acephalocyst. Formerly a number of varieties (see below) were made, but they are now known to be only modified forms. [L, 11, 121, 147, 182, 321, 340.] See ACEPHALOCYST and HYDATID, and Cf. ELECTRICITY, n. E-le^{2}k-tri^{2}s'i^{2}t-i^2. Lat., electricitas (from ἤλεκτρον, amber, because of its manifestation on rubbing amber). Fr., électricité. Ger., Electricität. It., elettricità. Sp., electricidad. One of the forces of nature (sometimes termed a "fluid," also a form of molecular movement) manifested in thunder and lightning, in the rapid induction of incandescence or combustion, attraction or repulsion, chemical decomposition, or muscular contraction, and in its conversion into mechanical force. It may be brought into action (generated) by friction or by the exposure of certain substances to the operation of certain chemical agents. One of its chief characteristics is its almost instantaneous transmissibility to any distance through the medium of a conductor. The apparatus consists of a core of soft iron or a bundle of soft-iron wire surrounded by some insulating material, around which, outside the insulating material, are wound several layers of insulated wire in the shape of a helix. This wire is termed the primary coil. Outside of this there is a sliding insulating tube around which is wound a very great length of fine insulated wire, constituting the secondary coil. The ends of the primary coil are connected with the poles of a battery, and those of the secondary coil with discharging points. The battery current passing through the primary coil converts the core for the instant into an electro-magnet, which excites an induced current (running in an opposite direction to the battery-current) in the secondary coil. When the core is demagnetized by the breaking of the current, an induced current (now running in the same direction as the battery-current) is also developed in the secondary coil. Except in very large coils, the induced current is slight when the connection with the battery is broken. The making and breaking of the primary current is performed by a vibrator or some form of mechanical interrupter. Between the battery and the primary current there is usually a condenser, which aids in the rapid demagnetization of the core. The strength of the induced current may be varied by sliding the secondary coil on the core. The induced current is of high tension, and is given off in rhythmical discharges, each one corresponding to an opening or closure of the battery circuit. With the electrodes applied to the body, muscular contractions are produced in the region included between them, either directly or through the medium of their nerves. The muscles are thus strengthened and many of the good effects of active exercise are produced. Induced e., especially with very rapid interruptions, has also an anodyne action, particularly in cases of muscular pain; applied by means of a wire-brush electrode, the skin being dry, it exerts a painful action that is sometimes of service in hysterical cases. [L.]—Influential e. The e. induced in a body whose neutral state has been disturbed by the action of either the positive or negative form existing in another body. That variety of galvanic e. which is given off from the non-decomposable element of a battery (e. g., the carbon of a zinc-carbon battery). [α, 27.]—Resinous e. Fr., électricité résineuse. Ger., Harzelectricität. The form of static e. generated by friction of a resinous body. [α, 27.]—Statical e., Static e. Fr., électricité statique. Ger., statische Electricität. Syn.: franklinism. E. in a state of high tension, produced by friction, pressure, or cleavage, and accumulated on the surface of an insulated conductor, manifesting its presence by attractive force and the display of sparks, but not by the production of currents. Two kinds of static e. are distinguished: vitreous (or positive) e., and resinous (or negative) e., both being supposed to reside in equal amounts in non-electrified bodies, and to neutralize each other. When two dissimilar bodies are rubbed together, one of them becomes charged with resinous, the other with vitreous e., and this disturbance of electrical equilibrium gives rise to the phenomena of static e. Bodies charged with the same kind of static e. repel each other, those charged with opposite kinds attract each other, and any body charged with a single kind tends to regain its electrical equilibrium by withdrawing from surrounding bodies an equal quantity of the opposite kind of e. Static e. has recently been considerably used in medicine. [B, 21 26.]—Thermo-e. See the major list.—Unbound e. See Free e.—Vitreous e. Fr., électricité vitrée. Ger., Glaselectricität. The form of e. generated by friction of glass. [a, 27.] See AMPÈREMETER and MILLIAMPÈREMETER.—Attracted disc e. See Quadrant e.—Capillary e. An instrument for measuring the intensity of an electric current, or more exactly the difference in the potential of its two electrodes. Lippmann's model is almost exclusively employed. It consists of a vertical tube drawn out to a point at its lower extremity and containing a column of mercury which descends into the narrow tubular part until it is arrested by capillary resistance. The point is plunged into a test-tube containing a layer of a dilute solution of sulphuric acid. By uniting the two bodies of mercury by a platinum wire, the capillary column becomes fixed in position, its lower meniscus representing the zero of the apparatus. The intensity of an electro-motor force interposed in the closed circuit can be measured by a micrometric reading of the extent of the upward or downward displacement of the inferior mercury meniscus. The displacement is due to the fact that the capillary constant of mercury when in contact with sulphuric acid varies with the electrical condition. [L, 87 (a, 27).]—Quadrant e. An instrument invented by W. Thomson to measure the potential of electricity of a body or the difference in the potentials of two bodies. It consists of a box composed of four equal horizontal and isolated metallic sectors, the diagonal members being coupled and of the same potential. A metallic plate is suspended by a wire in the centre of the box in such a manner that its axis is superposed upon one of the division lines of the sectors, to whose contours its own outlines are parallel. This plate is fully charged by means of a Leyden jar, but remains in repose so long as the sectors themselves are not charged. In order to determine the electrical condition of a given body, it is connected with one pair of quadrants, while the second pair communicates with the earth, and so is freed from tension. The current passing into the apparatus revolves the plate either to the right or to the left, according to whether the electricity is of the same or of a different kind from that with which the plate is charged. The amplitude and duration of the oscillation are limited by the resistance of the suspending wire, the time being proportional to the amplitude. By connecting a body with each quadrant couple in succession, the varying vibration of the plate will indicate the difference in their potentials. The plate is provided with a mirror that reflects the image of a scale to be read by means of a telescope. [B, 21, 270 (a, 27).]

The special expansion of a motor nerve-fibre at its termination in a striated muscular fibre. It consists of a medullated nerve, the primitive sheath of which becomes continuous with the sarcolemma of the muscle, while the axis-cylinder penetrates the sarcolemma, divides into numerous, often anastomosing branches, which spread out over the muscular substance. At the point of entrance of the axis-cylinder into the muscle-fibre there is usually an eminence formed by a granular nucleated mass, the appearance being as if many muscle corpuscles had become aggregated at this point. There are also many granular, nucleus-like masses situated along the twigs of the divided axis-cylinder. According to some investigators, the axis-cylinder is entirely outside the sarcolemma. According to Kühne, the motorial e.-p. is not the entire termination, but a clear space or substance between the granular mass and the axis-cylinder at the point where it penetrates the sarcolemma.
